

Now that Rishi Sunak has become the NEW Prime Minister of the UK as I expected earlier, let's move on to a much more difficult task: to predict who will be the next Brazilian President. This is a general election which involves a hugely divided population taking part in, instead of a "voting scheme" within a political Party itself. If my forecasting system really works, I will also try to predict in which year Rishi Sunak will be replaced as leader of the UK Conservatives.

The first round of Brazil presidential election was held on 2 Oct and; the result is shown as follows, however, Lula did not become the front-runner until 70% of the votes had been counted/reported and; after the magic 70% milestone having been reached, Lula was never been overtaken by incumbent president Jair Bolsonaro again:

Presidential results

From TSE via Reuters · First round · Official results

✓ 100% reporting · Lula and Jair Bolsonaro advance. The second round will take place on 30 October 2022.

Candidates	Vote %	Vote count
 Lula PT	48.4%	57,259,504
 Jair Bolsonaro PL	43.2%	51,072,345
 Simone Tebet MDB	4.2%	4,915,423
 Ciro Gomes PDT	3%	3,599,287

There are a list of very important assumptions for me to even start the prediction work:

- (1) Neither candidates will not be assassinated before and on the election day i.e. Sunday, 30th Oct (local time) because Brazil has a tradition of political assassinations now and then;
- (2) "The Leader" of a country is "selected" by certain special interest groups rather than "elected" by ordinary citizens who cast their votes at a voting booth;
- (3) Whether or not a candidate and his Party who lost the election are willing to accept the outcome is not within the scope of this forecasting project;
- (4) No moral judgement over "election fraud" as the saying goes "all is fair in love and war" and; an election is a form of civil war without exchange of bullets and fists;

Lula's connections to the "Club":

Brazilian presidential frontrunner Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva is considering raising royalties on certain mining projects if elected, a campaign adviser told Reuters, likely affecting iron ore giant Vale SA and other multinationals.

Under the proposal drafted by mining specialists working for Lula's Workers' Party (PT), the government would charge an increased royalty rate – known as a “special stake” – on minerals of particularly high value, whether due to geological characteristics or market demand, according to a party geologist and documents seen by Reuters.

Brazil's Lula says he hopes Bolsonaro will accept election result

Far-right Bolsonaro has questioned Brazil's electronic voting system, raising concerns he plans to contest results.

Brazilians will cast their votes on Sunday in the second round of one of the most divisive elections in nation's history, pitting incumbent far-right President Jair Bolsonaro against former left-wing President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva [File: Adriano Machado/Reuters]

24 Oct 2022

A key word here is “far-right”, what is the meaning of being “far-right” ? very simple, corporations are owned by the government under a far-right system, like in Nazi Germany; so, have all Brazilian private companies been nationalised by Bolsonaro government? absolutely not.

It appears that behind Lula there is a very powerful force supporting him to win the coming election.
